The feature picture at the Pavilion to-day is one in which one of the most noted stage favorites of the day, Mr. Sidney Drew, plays the leading part. The story of the picture is adapted from the play that he has made famous on both continents, and is entitled "When Two Hearts Are Won." It has been said that dramatic actors cannot make a success of the silent, or picture, drama without special training, as the speaking actor is lost when he has no words to repeat. In this picture, Mr. Drew proves that the legitimate actor is fully capable of playing the silent drama as forcefully as the speaking drama, and his portrayal of the hapless groom is remarkably clever. The famous bull pup, the same one that he used in the play, contributes largely to the funny situation. Evans, Hughs and Evans continue to please greatly in their comedy sketch, entitled "Professional Life." The picture program to-day will consist of three reels of pictures, instead of two reels. The Sidney Drew picture being an extra attraction. The usual acts of vaudeville will complete the program.
